The difference should be obvious in this image, though: Even in the best-case scenario, the result wasn't terribly photorealistic. We liked the result, but it still looks a bit too "cartoonish. Here are some more examples: I do not suggest you bring the iPad Pro while shopping. You can open up all kinds of mobile apps via Safari's HTTP/S protocol — but many websites don't want to support HTTP/S because it's a bit slower than the old old html way. Not all mobile websites show well on the original iPad, but they will show very well on the iPad Pro. When you're having trouble viewing a website on the original iPad, just try opening it in Safari anyway, and see if you get the same results. If not, your only choices are to ask the store for a bigger screen, or walk home. I went to a Burger King, for example, and it didn't want to work. Safari didn't want to work. Mobile Safari told me I wasn't connected, and the web page I wanted to see didn't want to work. I now use it as if I pretty much have a projector in my pocket, and the iPad Pro now has a projector mode. Not all its flaws are hidden away. 3D capability has improved, and you can create better models for real-world objects and environments. It now lets you use multiple points for edges, so you can duplicate, move, or apply different actions to individual parts of your 3D models. The 64 GB model is the more expensive of the two we have reviewed. As we look at iPorter.com's iOS App Store Metrics Page, we see "128" as the app's price. This might seem fine, but I'd prefer not to buy it at 128 and then find that, when you actually download it, it's only free for a few more days. This model costs $199.
