While today's political debate abounds with conservative slogans talking about "less government, less taxes", it is well worth remembering that during the nineteenth century the political world operated under a different set of rules - and one we would do well to follow today. By the time of the late nineteenth century, European countries had adopted a liberal economic system that relied heavily on government intervention to sustain and stimulate private enterprise. In doing so they had largely eradicated the type of economic crises, like those that had wreaked havoc on the European economies in the late nineteenth century, that had been so prevalent in the previous decades. The key element of this liberal economic system was the fact that government would intervene when it saw that the market was functioning inefficiently - in a way that was likely to result in national or regional economic harm. Given this intervention, one might expect the hard working members of society to benefit from it. But it is rare that, in any democracy, the hard working members of society benefit from government intervention. Instead, the hard working members of society will find that their standard of living will drop if the government begins to interfere in the economy. That was certainly the case in European countries by the late nineteenth century. It was the upheaval caused by the series of economic crises in the late nineteenth century that prompted the Austrian-born economist Eugen von Böhm-Bawerk to write his two classic books The Positive Theory of Capital and Capital and Interest (available on the Internet here). I have previously described here and here how Böhm-Bawerk's article, in the form of what is often thought to be his first book, was in part aimed at a society in which the hard working members of society were facing rising
